1804 La Louisiane - edp - 60 ml/ 2.03 fl oz

606110396226

€ 180

The "Day of the Three Flags" was the culmination of the Louisiana Purchase, in which France sold a large swath of territory to the United States. Land that doubled the size of the country and today comprises 15 states. The agreement surprised the Spanish, who had recently ceded the lands in a treaty to the French. In fact, they still dominated most of the territory. Residents of the territory north of New Orleans had not received any notification, so it was decided that another official ceremony would be held in St. Louis in March 1804. To update the new identity of the territory, it is required to carry out the protocol of two treaties at the same time. On March 8, the flag of Spain was lowered and that of France was raised. On March 9, that of France was lowered and that of the United States was raised, until today. Waving 3 consecutive flags.

Using wood from the extinct toromiro tree, a figure of a kavakava moai was carved in the time of the Tu'u Koihu ariki, eldest son of the first Ariki of Rapa Nui, Hotu Matu'a. In 1868 the figure was shipped to London on the ship "Topaze". The National Botanical Garden of Viña del Mar has the last toromiro tree (Shopora toromiro) and the extract of its flowers was collected to recreate the aroma in honor of the Arikis of Rapa Nui.

Many times the call to Peace requires finding alternative, diverse and divergent paths. Breaking schemes does not mean destroying everything, it is rather flooding everything with our best intentions.

On Good Friday in 1958, thousands gathered in Trafalgar Square in London to protest against nuclear weapons. They were responding to a series of test explosions carried out by the United Kingdom, the third nation to join the nuclear club after the United States and the USSR. Over the next four days, the bravest marched to Aldermaston, a small town 50 miles west of London, where British nuclear weapons were designed and stored. On the posters and banners of the protesters, a new symbol was making its first appearance. Gerald Holtom, designer and pacifist, had developed it from the letters 'N' and 'D' of the traffic light alphabet, the code used by sailors.

Grotte Cosquer, is an underwater cave containing prehistoric paleolithic paintings. The grotto is located east of Marseille, in the Calanque de la Triperie, near Cape Morgiou. Its entrance is located about 37 m below the level of the Mediterranean Sea, and it is thought that it could have been used as a sanctuary between 27,000 and 19,000 BC, before its entrance was covered due to rising sea levels. The grotto has more than 200 figures, corresponding to the Gravetian phase and the Solutrean phase.

Regio's origins are lost between archeology and mythology: it was, probably from the end of the 3rd millennium BC, inhabited by pelagic populations from Ashkenazios, Ausonians, Enotrios and, finally, by the Italos, a city called Erythrà ("The Red One") by the Calcides. It was an important and flourishing polis of Magna Grecia surrounded by numerous districts that had fortifications in front of the island of Sicily, it was later a Roman municipium and seat of the Corrector of Lucania and Brucia, as well as being a hub of commercial, maritime and land networks throughout the entire classical age. Via Regilia (or Via Annea) left from Regium, a road built in the 2nd century BC. that reached Capua, and from there to Rome. From its port called "Rhegina Column", to the north of the city, boats left for Sicily, and from its ancient Greek port, to the south of the city, for the entire Mediterranean
